Amanda Laird Creegan is an accomplished matrimonial and family law attorney at Offit Kurman. With a career exclusively focused on matrimonial and family law, Amanda demonstrates a steadfast commitment to taking a practical and thoughtful approach in resolving her clients' needs, whether representing executives in the financial or technology sectors, start-up founders, actors, artists, or spouses.

Amanda regularly appears in the New York Supreme Court and Family Court, allowing her to identify and address critical issues in family law litigation, including child custody disputes and alimony matters. Her wealth of experience as a matrimonial judicial law clerk, coupled with her extensive background in drafting complex settlement, prenuptial, and postnuptial agreements, positions her as a trusted advocate for her clients.

At the heart of Amanda's practice is her unwavering commitment to understanding her clients' unique circumstances. This personalized approach, rooted in empathy, enables her to navigate the complexities of family law—whether involving child support, marital agreements, or high-net-worth divorce cases—with compassion and clarity. By focusing on the issues that matter most to her clients, she provides effective solutions tailored to their specific situations.

Prior to joining Offit Kurman, Amanda was a partner at a boutique matrimonial and family law firm in Manhattan, where she honed her skills in case management and strategy. She began her career serving as a judicial clerk for the Honorable Thomas P. Zampino, J.S.C. (ret.) in the Chancery Division, Family Part, in Newark, New Jersey. During her law school years, Amanda gained invaluable experience working in Seton Hall Law's Center for Social Justice and Family Law Clinic and interning at Sanctuary for Families, a center for battered women.
