Howard Kurman Quoted in Law360 Article on Potential Labor Policy Shifts Under Trump Administration

November 26, 2024

Howard Kurman, a principal at Offit Kurman and a seasoned authority in labor and employment law, was recently quoted in a Law360 article discussing anticipated labor policy changes following President-elect Donald Trump's return to the White House.

The article explores the potential impact on labor relations, particularly the expected shift toward more management-friendly policies at the National Labor Relations Board (NLRB). With anticipated changes to leadership and enforcement priorities, employers may face new challenges and opportunities in navigating labor laws.

Kurman commented on the risks employers might weigh when deciding whether to challenge Biden-era union-friendly precedents, such as the Cemex decision, under a reconfigured NLRB. He also emphasized the importance of closely monitoring upcoming appointments to the NLRB and the role they will play in shaping labor policy under the new administration.
